Interfaculty Program in Regional Development

Admission Policy

We seek to admit those who possess the knowledge, skills, abilities, sense of purpose, motivations and attitudes listed below. In order to select a diverse body of students, we use a variety of screening methods and materials, including achievement tests, application documents, short essays, and interviews.

1. Basic knowledge and skills necessary for study in the Interfaculty Program in Regional Development;
2. Ability to identify challenges facing communities, particularly regional issues such as population decline and multicultural coexistence, to think about solutions from multiple perspectives, and to express ideas logically;
3. Desire to solve regional issues proactively through collaborating and cooperating with people of diverse backgrounds and values, and engaging with them actively;
4. A strong interest in local communities, along with a clear sense of purpose and desire to contribute to society as a community leader;
5. A strong interest in the complex challenges facing local communities, particularly multicultural coexistence and regional revitalization, along with the desire to take the initiative in addressing these issues and a foundation in logical expression.